Clothing and Airbase Material Culture

Selected reference material assembled for B-17 production support on Thorpe-Abbotts airfield design. This brief was intendedto help anchor an aspect everyday life on base, not just the aircraft and mission aspects. The goal of this kind of reference work was to give artists and modellers concrete visual material and help the base feel lived-in.

1. Everyday movement and support-space context

Rows of bicycle plinths and a photo of the surrounding space help establish how ordinary infrastructure shaped movement around the base. Small reference details like this are useful for environment dressing and for grounding large historical spaces in believable routine use. Bicycles were a common sight on bases and a valuable way to economise on fuel consumption, but one might not have otherwise expected to see them without evidence.

2. Kitchen clogs, duty wear, and practical economy

Wooden-soled clogs are a useful example of period ww2 material culture. They demonstrate an aspect of non-combat work on base. As noted in the provided reference lisys, civilian women were not the only wearers of these wooden-soled shoes; W.A.A.F. cooks and kitchen personnel also used clogs on duty to prolong and economise on service shoes.

Left: unissued W.A.A.F. clogs in packaging. Right: object reference showing wooden soles, leather uppers, and construction detail. These were provided to our character artists to help them create accurately dressed examples of historical characters.

Additional wear reference helps show silhouette, posture, and how the footwear read in everyday use - invaluable for the art team.

3. Issue records and equipment checklists

Archival checklists records are invaluable to the designer. They show what people were issued in contemporary terms, how items were categorized, and how clothing and quantitatively how prevalent objects were. This is useful for asset planning, character designs, and support-space dressing, especially when trying to distinguish between everyday wear, specialist issue, and role-specific equipment.
